Kristie Prinz, Imran Alavi to Present on "Best Practices on How to Launch a Software Development Project"

If you are a ProVisors member with a goal of launching your own software product, then please plan to attend a special virtual presentation + networking event on Wednesday, March 19 at 4 p.m. PT: "Best Practices on How to Launch a Software Development Project." The presentation will address what you need to know to get started with launching your software development project. Attendance at this event is limited to ProVisors members only. The event is intended for anyone having software development aspirations without specific software development experience. It is anticipated to be the first of a series of similar events for ProVisors members with software development aspirations. To register to attend, please sign up at this link.

---

at 4 p.m. PT: "Best Practices on How to Launch a Software Development Project." The presentation will address what you need to know to get started with launching your software development project. Attendance at this event is limited to ProVisors members only. The event is intended for anyone having software development aspirations without specific software development experience. It is anticipated to be the first of a series of similar events for ProVisors members with software development aspirations. To register to attend, please sign up at this link.

Most Early-Stage Development Projects Overlook the Need to Procure a Copyright Assignment

If you are like most early stage software companies, you will complete your next development project without ever asking for or procuring a copyright assignment. The Silicon Valley Software Law Blog explored this issue in the blog post linked below:

http://www.siliconvalleysoftwarelaw.com/copyright-assignmentsoverlookedinmostdevelopmentprojects